

NZDSOS Address: RED Remembrance Day

Fifteen November 2021 remains the date that damaged this country severely. The mandates that came into force that day were not a minor policy adjustment. They were a seismic shift in the relationship between the state and the individual. They divided workplaces, families, and communities. They created a class of people excluded from participation in ordinary life on the basis of political decisions disguised as public health measures. We are not forgetting that.

We are the ones who have lived with the consequences. Not in theory, not in modelling, not in press releases, but in the cold hard reality of damaged health, disrupted lives, and in many cases, bereavement. We have all seen the harms and documented them. We have tried, repeatedly, to have them acknowledged. And we know, with a certainty that comes from direct observation and careful analysis, that our understanding of what happened is accurate.

Ethics and morality are not optional extras in a free society. They are the foundation. Once they fall, a peaceful life is over. The suspension of informed consent, the coercion of individuals, the suppression of dissenting medical opinion, the willful blindness to completely obvious harm - these are not administrative failures. They are moral failures. And a society that cannot name a moral failure cannot correct it.

This year, perhaps more than any other so far, red is for the cold hard fury that we turned to steely determination and purposeful action. 2026 has seen real progress, as we might expect after 5 years of resistance and hard work.

We have seen the beginning of accountability at the Medical Council, at least on some issues, with new appointments and a potential opportunity to engage, though early signs are encouraging.

We have come to understand the nature of the brand new disease since 2021 of the rubbery white clots being pulled from so many dead people, but forming in the living.

We have seen public support grow and we thank sincerely everyone who has helped us.

We have seen political successes, including pressuring the second Royal Commission into disclosures which have shown us how far and fast the government was prepared to go to mass vaccinate, against all sensible science and legal protections. And around the world, in courts and in parliaments, actions are being taken to push back. Who'd have thought that names like Gates, Bourla, and a prime minister would have to face their accusers, whatever the eventual outcome?

The resistance to surveillance, to the poisoning of populations, to social engineering and the tyrannical capture of our laws and national identities is not confined to this country. It is international, and the connections we have formed make us stronger and better empowered to help redirect humanity's journey.

We continue to believe there is a criminal case to answer. The evidence exists for covid crimes. It is being assembled. NZDSOS has gathered much of it, but so many others have contributed and, rest assured, all this work is NOT being wasted. 6 years on, we are finding out who and how people and structures that would have identified risks very early on were sidelined. The short version of course, is that none of this was done lawfully. There is much dust that is settling and clarity is emerging.

As ever, we are grateful. Grateful to every person who has supported us, who has fought to get to the truth, who has refused to accept the official version of events. And most importantly, we are grateful to the bereaved and the vaccine injured who do their best in an appalling situation. We see you. We support you, not least through our hard-working health clinic, which has capacity and a willingness to provide ethical and unbiased health care to all, not just to the vaccine injured. We fight for all of you, including all of those fighting against us, because they remain deceived; and, of course, for all of our children and those who will come long after we are gone.

We are sorry on behalf of our fractured profession. It has not deserved its social standing since the day of the infamous guidance document. Its current punishment is the overwork of an overwhelmed health system, and perhaps the personal torment of complicity.

So how do we repair medicine, nursing, midwifery and the other allied professions whose regulators bent the knee in fear and for favour?

One way is to look forward to a date soon when ALL health workers, whether on graduation day or the day before their retirement, have to take a binding oath - in public, and to the public. They must also acknowledge that everything terrible that has happened was predictable by first principles of ethics, genetics, toxicology and human psychology and that their training and preparedness to guard human life at all costs was deficient. Their new oath must not be to the crown, big pharma, the Federation or their regulators. They must swear not only to serve the individual patient to the best of their professional training and personal conscience, but they must resist any exploitative special interests which clash with ethics and human rights.

Talking of oaths, this year we have heard and seen government people write and say the most outrageously wrong things under oath in the courtroom. Do these legally binding promises to tell the truth mean anything at all anymore? We suppose that it is for our colleagues in the Law to establish this but there are precious few willing to stand up and we must support those who do. Just like NZDSOS members and other brave professionals in teaching, media and even politics, they have been attacked for their bravery too.

So, there is another government coming. For us that means some new officials to educate in the bleeding obvious and others to hold to account for their past and ongoing decisions. Whatever the outcome of the special votes November 27th and the coalition negotiations, our task does not change. The work of seeking truth, of holding power to account, of restoring medical ethics and the defending human rights, continues whoever is in government. The tasks are unchanging because the principles are unchanging and MUST be defended.

Let's make the year ahead one for visibility. Now we can see the Epstein class and their many, many enablers - every country has them - let’s call them out. Their silence, cowardice and complicity cannot be allowed to dominate our lives.

Let's help make the many vaccine damaged visible too, as visible as the crumbling health system collapsing under the weight of all the undiagnosed vax injured and immune deficient. We can't treat this if we deny it exists.

Support us, support each other, support free and independent media, but know that EVERYONE awake and aware shares the responsibility, to take concrete actions and above all else DO NOT BE SILENT!

Thank you.
